The night of my piano recital had finally arrived. I had been practicing for months. Even so, I felt so nervous that I was sick. I looked everywhere for Mrs. Napoli, my piano teacher. She was busy getting sheets of music together and trying to find a better microphone, so I didn't bother her. Instead, I peeked out from behind the curtain into the audience. Through the curtains I saw my family. I could see them from where I was behind the curtain. My brother looked like he had been dragged kicking and screaming to the auditorium, but my father and mother looked happy and proud, maybe even a little excited and nervous, too. I did not want to disappoint them.
